Overview

Andrew Halstead represents clients in intellectual property litigation, including trademark and copyright infringement disputes. He has experience drafting discovery motions, dispositive motions and appellate briefs; conducting depositions; arguing motions in state court; and assisting with trial preparation and presentation.

His broader practice experience includes civil litigation and health care-related matters, as well as advising clients on Federal Trade Commission requirements governing advertising practices. He has also assisted with pro bono litigation involving Eighth Amendment claims.

While in law school, Andrew served as a Senior Editor of the Boston College Law Review and as a student attorney in the Community Enterprise Clinic, where he assisted entrepreneurs, small businesses and nonprofit organizations with transactional matters and intellectual property issues. He also worked as a law clerk at Build IP, conducting patentability and prior art searches, and completed a legal externship with Triage Cancer. Andrew earned his undergraduate degree in biology.
